SECTION C  (10 MARKS)

Read the following passage carefully and then answer the question that follows. Write your answers in the spaces provided in the Answer Booklet.

The idea of forming closer political links between the three territories in Central Africa dated back to the early days of European settlement. As early as 1915, the BSA company had suggested amalgamating the two Rhodesia, both then under the company rule, to cut down the administrative costs. But the settlers in Southern Rhodesia had not seen any advantage in this and the matter was dropped.

In 1949 representatives of the three territories met to consider the proposal to form a federation at a conference at the Victoria Falls. They agreed that a Federation would promote the overall economic development of the three territories which were experiencing the post-war boom conditions and a resolution in favour of a Federation was passed unanimously.

In Central Africa there were special reasons for joining the three territories, Nyasaland and Rhodesia. European population was rapidly developing so was the economy both in farming and in manufacturing industry. Northern Rhodesia, with her great copper deposits, was developing big towns on the Copperbelt but had large and backward rural areas. Nyasaland lacking in minerals, relied on agriculture and sent her big surplus population to work as migrant labour in neighbouring countries.
The natural way of transporting tobacco from the North-Eastern part of Northern Rhodesia was down the Nyasaland railway to Beira. It would help Nyasaland a great deal if some wealth that came from Northern Rhodesia’s Copper and Southern Rhodesia’s tobacco and chromium, could be spent on improving her roads, schools and hospitals. The river Zambezi and some of its tributaries such as Kafue, could be dammed so as to provide electricity. It could be much better to have one government to plan the electricity schemes for the good of all the countries than to have three governments trying to reach agreements, each thinking only of its people. In fact, the Federal government did build a great dam on the Zambezi at the Kariba gorge and the electricity which was produced there was shared between Southern and Northern Rhodesia. All these are economic arguments.

In 1950, the Southern Rhodesia government gave notice that it would leave the Central African Council in a year’s time. This frightened many people in Britain into thinking that Southern Africa was becoming harder and harder and people in Britain thought it important that there should be one strong British government in Central Africa to prevent Apartheid and other South-African ideas from coming further north.

British thought also that the Federation would promote racial partnership in the three territories.

Today these people live in East, Central and Southern Africa. They speak languages which are similar and have related culture. One theory states that these people came from West Africa. From west Africa, these people spread out in the eastern and western directions. One reason for their migrations was the growth of the biggest desert in the world.
Two vast empires were founded in the Congo. Here their population increased so greatly that a second wave of migration soon took place. Still in the nineteenth century, conditions in South Africa forced these people to move again.

Generally, these people are cattle raising. They also planted crops, usually millet. The men made wooden, iron and copper tools and women made pottery. Before planting they burnt off the grass or cleared the Bush and then sowed the seeds. When the soil become poorer they moved to new places. In Zambia, these people established a trading centre.
